

UNREHEARSED ACT AT THE CIRCUS

How Stanislaus Dapkus Olsen,
a Russian Finn, Outwitted Manager Beverley.

The night was Wednesday. The scene, the arena of Beverley's all-star circus, playing every night to paying business on the vacant lot opposite the Hawaiian Hotel.

Enter Frank Beverley, grotesquely garbed in the habiliments of a clown. He ties a bundle of newspapers behind him, the wad of literature resembling a lady's bustle, and being worn as was that now extinct article of feminine apparel. He lights a number of candles, and then appeals to the small boys in the gallery as follows:

"I'll give 50 cents to the boy who can light me bustle."

Instantly half a dozen ambitious and puerile youths swarm into the ring, grab the candles and the contest starts.

Beverley sets a killing pace; he bobs around the ring in the attitude generally ascribed in cheap chronos to the Pied Piper of Hamelin. Frantically the mob of boys pursue him, but all in vain. His ludicrous antics convert the so-called bustle into an effective fire-extinguisher, and time and time again the energy of the young incendiaries is brought to naught.

A hush in the proceedings. Enter into the game Stanislaus Dapkus Olsen, a Russian Finn of parts. He cowers, holding a lighted candle, on the edge of the ring with cheeks strangely puffed up, until Beverley, who dodges him with the celerity of Papa Ita, passes him on the eleventh lap of his victorious go-as-you-please. Watching his chance the Finn darts from his lair; he makes a movement with his lips and a stream of oil gushes from his mouth and drenches the elusive paper bustle. The candle, deftly wielded, does the rest.

Flames, smoke, curses, the shrieks of the wounded and the applause of the rabble.

Frantic tearing of grotesque habiliments; a mad rush of the victim through the exit, and earnest application of healing salves.

Enter Officer Frank Ferreira, who grabs the prize-winner and hustles him to the police station, where the captain of the squad dismisses him and tells him not to do it again.

Beverley, "Quit it—If Stanislaus Dapkus Olsen buys me a new suit of clothes, all may yet be well."

Stanislaus Dapkus Olsen, loquacious: "Did I won dat feefy cent? I tank so."
